MARTHA By Camilla Turnbull

Short Story

Welcome to my new story, Rise of Legende! I have been working on this story idea for awhile. I hope you enjoy it! New chapters every week. I might even complete two a week if I work hard! Happy reading!!

Chapter one

The air is chilly against my red cheeks. Today is a colder day, so most animals will be in there dens if they are smart. Because of that, I am not allowed to go hunting. But, like every year, tomorrow would be warmer near the geaser in our village, so any small mammals, who needed to keep up a constant body temperature, would come as close as they dared. Than I would take my Dad's bow and arrows and hunt all day, only sparring small animals.

I mount Mi, my Fathers Landsloth, and haul my sack of plants I found growing in some caves onto my lap. Mi starts toward our cluster of caves. Me and my family live there with our many relatives. The adults teach the children 11 and older to hunt and gather, and went we are old enough, we get our parents Landsloths, and they get to cook and clean for the rest of us. I sigh. My family will have to cook with whatever meat we have saved tonight.

"Zorra!" My friend Tayson runs up the hill. "Baba had a dream!"

My heart starts to beat. "A bad one?"

"Yes! She said that in her dream the ice split, and there was tons of water all around the planet! She said we HAD to run, or tomorrow it would happen and we would all die."

I closed my eyes. Baba used to be respected. But now, she has been lowered to the 'crazy old lady' status. No one would listen. But me and Tayson knew about her powerful dreams. "We need to go tonight." I said.

Baba sat near the geyser. Whenever someone came in to lay some cloths over it, she would try to warn them. They walked away, they all did. Pea, their sun guardian could not do it alone. I. No one understood. This was a sign. And this kind of power..... it only meant one thing. Stargazer was returning.
